Early Learning Indiana launches $50-million Early Years Initiative focused on the development of Indiana's youngest learners.

Program and statewide grants supported by Lilly Endowment Inc.

INDIANAPOLIS – Early Learning Indiana (ELI) announced today the launch of the Early Years Initiative, which will provide grants to help organizations in Indiana strengthen their efforts to support the development of very young children.

Through the competitive initiative funded by Lilly Endowment, ELI is making available up to $50 million in grants to help eligible organizations meet the developmental needs of infants and toddlers (birth through age three) and surround Hoosier families with the resources to make the most of these crucial years of learning. Organizations eligible in this initiative include social service providers, faith-based organizations, community foundations, United Ways, child care providers, school districts, higher education institutions and other not-for-profit organizations.

Studies show that a child's brain is hardest at work during the first three years of life, busy creating the foundation for all future learning capacity, social-emotional development, and mental and physical health. Through the Early Years Initiative, ELI will fund programs and projects that influence healthy brain development in young children and other aspects of their physical, social-emotional and cognitive wellbeing.

ELI expects to make approximately 200 grants ranging from $75,000 to $500,000. Proposals are due by June 15, 2023. ELI plans to announce funding decisions by August 31, 2023. Learn more about the initiative and the application process here.

"We only have a few short years to set our youngest Hoosiers on a path to thrive in life, and we're committed to ensuring they have opportunities for the best possible start," said Maureen Weber, president and CEO of Early Learning Indiana. "This unprecedented initiative will accelerate the scaling of proven programs and bring innovative practices to Indiana — developing stronger and more resilient children who are ready to learn."

Eligible organizations can submit proposals to address a range of needs as varied as those of the infants and toddlers they are designed to serve. Examples may include strengthening families through home visits, ensuring access to supportive childcare, bolstering development through early detection of developmental needs and disabilities and responsive interventions, and cultivating essential skills through early language programming, among others. The Early Years Initiative has a focus on the needs of children in low-income households, children from communities of color and children who are multi-language learners.

“The environment and experiences of a child’s first three years of life substantially influence cognitive social, emotional and physical development and often affect long term academic success and quality of life,” said Ted Maple, Lilly Endowment’s vice president for education. “They are especially important for children in economically disadvantaged households whose families often lack access to supportive programs and information about child development, both of which can make a big difference for parents and their children.”

“ELI, with its deep knowledge of and experience in early childhood education, is well-positioned to support organizations that have the interest in and ability to implement proven and promising programs and interventions for very young children.”

Lilly Endowment has made a $55 million grant to support the Early Years Initiative, which includes $50 million for grants and $5 million to help ELI administer the competitive initiative and provide technical assistance to organizations funded through it.
